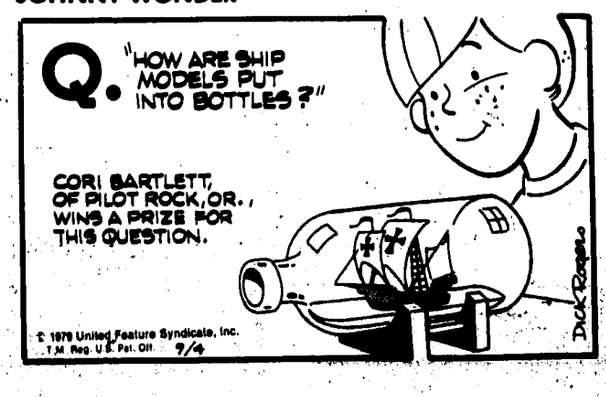
JOHNNY WONDER



A. To pass the time on long voyages, sailors often made model sailing ships in narrow-necked bottles. To get the ship in the bottle, the builder first constructed the ship outside the bottle. When the ship was finished, he tied a thread to the tip of the front mast and carefully folded the masts and rigging so that they lay flat on the deck. Now the ship was small enough to slip through the narrow neck and into the bottle. Once inside the bottle, a tug on the thread pulled up the first mast. That tightened the ship's rigging, and the rigging pulled up the other masts.
